Interest and support from criminal legal partners is a good thing, but also runs the risk of CJ systems absorbing RJ processes in a way that may muddle the need for it to be a community-driven response. To do it right and in the community, it takes time, training and resources.

I try to really change the perspective – just because you commit a crime you are not a horrible person. You have to be able to look past the crime and be creative enough to give second chances and opportunities. You have to see who they are and where they come from. Sometimes you just don't want to put people in jail for the rest of their life. Justice and safety does not always equate punishment.

Victims want to know why did this happen to me and will you do this again. I think RJ has a place. For a long time we have equated punishment with justice and when you do not get that it feels like a betrayal. We need a framework to equate justice with accountability and repairing harm.
